MAGIC FILM WAND WAVED OVER SNOW WHITE AND SEVEN DWARFS. Beautiful Little Marguerite Clark Stars In Adaptation Of Beloved Fairy Tale

The magic film wand has been waved over the beloved pages of the Grimm Brothers' fairy tales and there has stepped forth exquisite little "Snow White" in the person of Marguerite Clark. The wand is in the hand of J. Searle Dawley, who directed the adaptation of the fairy tale for the Famous Players Film Company, by whom it is released on the Paramount Program.

The choice of Miss Clark for the title role was a most happy one, as the little star had already scored a great personal success in the stage version of "Snow White" in which she starred for two seasons under the management of Winthrop Ames. Creighton Hale, well known motion picture player, appears in support of Miss Clark in the role of the Prince who refuses to be lured from his quest of Snow White by the wiles of the wicked Queen Brangomar.

One of the most unique features of this delightful picture is the fact that the famous Seven Little Dwarfs are actually impersonated on the screen by seven midgets. Instead of doing the obviously simple thing and having children play the roles of the dwarfs, the producers decided that the highest form of realism could best be gained by having bona-fide illigitians assume the roles of the dwarfs. To that end a careful search was made until the required seven could be found—for it was not enough that the applicant for the position be short. He must be so tiny that he would seem little, even when he appeared in the scenes with the diminutive Miss Clark, the smallest "big" star on the screen.

Though some of the little claps who were finally engaged were very reluctant to disclose their ages, one of them admitted that he was over sixty and several pleaded guilty to having been shaken in their cradles by the news of Bull Run. It was the first time that some of them had ever been in a motion picture studio before, and their comments on what they saw there were a source of delight to Miss Clark. One of the seven had appeared in support of Ann Pennington as the circus midget in "The Rainbow Princess," and he, feeling himself to be a veteran, took upon his miniature shoulders the responsibility of initiating the other six into the mysteries of the camera.
